Play the devotion: LISTING WITH SONG LISTENZE WITHOUT "When the angels had departed from them in heaven, the shepherds began to tell each other: "Let us go straight to Bethlehem and see this thing that has happened that the Lord has made us known." So they went quickly and found their way to Mary and Joseph, and the child as he was in the manger." (Luke 2:15-16) Hark! Herald angels sing! When did they stop singing? Luke makes it clear that the angels "had removed from them in heaven". Have you ever thought about what happened when that choir went silent? How was the day after the birth of Jesus? It is in answering these questions that we move beyond the familiarity of the Christmas version in competition and in the rough contours of the glory of the incarnation. Assuming from the radiated details offered in the narrative that it is easy to simply advance our meditation with inspired words and not to take our abode in the space of seven days mysteriously boarding in front of us. It is as if the brilliant flash of glory on Christmas Day was so bright that we forget that it in fact thaws, at least in its outward manifestation. The shepherds left and Mary and Joseph were alone with a newborn. Without doubt all the eyes above were fixed on those three hearts beating in Bethlehem and their low estate, but no hand reached to assist, no angels were there to serve the Babe. How was that first night? Another family hymn says: "He didn't cry," yet it can hardly be true that it was a silent night. While Mary was looking for a little rest within the cold, the rough confines of the stable was excited by the voice of her little One who is hungry for nourishment no longer received in the womb. And then the dawn came... Although they were parents in aforeign to them. Most pressings were the need for more permanent accommodation. What filled their minds like their tired bodiesa place of refuge where you can rest and take care of their child? The only answer offered by Scripture is Mary's warning that she meditates these things in her heart (Luke 2:19). Surely the enormity of the events they had experienced, which extended until the initial visit by Gabriele, provided some comfort. However, he probably did not shield Mary's muscles from the fatigue of work or her eyes from the burning weight of fatigue, more than the greatness of Jesus' divine identity made him is immune to the hunger, thirst and sleep of a newborn. While the three made their way through the narrow alleys of the city, everyone felt it completely and completely. Yet, he left, cradled in his mother's arms - the Word became flesh now dwelling among us. Not only in the culminating moment of his birth, when the melodies of angels filled the valley below, but in the darkness of his second day of life while his parents knocked at the door and sought hospitality. For the first time during those seven beards the outlandish words of John 1:10 sound true: "It was in the world did not know Him." It is sure to say that the ancient Jewish culture and domestic life have been far from the modern West, and that Mary and Joseph have become well known to the residents of this small unknown city in Judea and to the guests who have still clinged to the census. People were talking, as the Scripture itself reveals, and the remarkable conditions in which Mary had given birth and at least some of the wild stories told by the shepherds probably circulated here and there, creating a movement among the premises. We can imagine that the couple of Nazareth had more awkward conversations on their child that week that most have in a lifetime. Still all this clamor must be seen as a simple drop pin compared to the ardant, earth shielding, burst that had actually happened in the stable that night. The majestic Creator of all was born, the eternal Word had taken flesh before the eyes of men. And for the most part on the surface it was just another week in Bethlehem, except for a little excitement on "the child". Which, of course, was still. It was not until the eighth day he received a name. God had come, and chose to be brought as an unknown and unnamed stay as he sought a rest place in the city of David. May finds it in us in the quiet and normality of these days leading to Christmas. Christmas.
